Oregon State University is committed to advancing lifelong health and well-being for all. In order to achieve that status, health must be realized as a comprehensive concept including physical as well as mental health. These walks offer a mental escape from day-to-day life, allowing time to appreciate the history, beauty, and culture of this great campus.

There are over 2,500 pieces in the Oregon State art collection, with over 1,000 contributing artists, from sculptures and paintings to mixed media; there is sure to be a piece that speaks to every art enthusiast or curious person.

Outdoor Sculpture

1. What We Hold Dear
   (East and West side of the ILLC)
   These statues tell a story of culture and diversity at OSU. Read the plaques on each sculpture to learn the significance of the items attached to their backs. There are five statues on both the East and West side of the building.

2. Sculptural Seating Elements
   (ResHall Quad)
   These sculptures are surrounded by a welcoming gathering space for students. Complete with benches and grills, the space invites students to relax after a long day in classes.

3. The Quest
   (East of the MU Quad)
   Alice Eudorah Biddle (Mooreland) was the first woman to graduate from OSU. This semi-hidden sculpture encourages students to continue to forge new paths.

4. Martin Kukučín
   (West side of the Valley Library)
   Kukučín was a Slovakian writer, dramatist, and publicist, and traveled the world pursuing a medical degree. Appropriately placed outside of the Valley Library, this sculpture reveals the importance of the pursuit of knowledge.

5. Joy Selig
   (West side of the Valley Gymnastics Center next to stairs)
   Joy Selig was a three-time All-American during her Oregon State University career. Selig was the first person in NCAA history to win back-to-back national championships in floor exercises and balance beam.

6. Turning Two
   (NW Corner of Coleman Field)
   This sculpture is facing towards the center opening of Coleman Field, which has been OSU’s only home field since varsity baseball began in 1907.

Be Well. Be Orange.
